a global concern

The World Health Organization reports that more than 220 million people worldwide (6% of the adult population) currently suffer from diabetes.

According to figures from the American Diabetes Association and Canadian Diabetes Association:

- 25.8 million children and adults in the US and more than three million in Canada currently suffer from diabetes.
- 8 million of those live undiagnosed.
- The annual cost of care for those suffering is more than $200 billion.

85 million Americans and Canadians are prediabetic

With no signs of slowing down, the threat of diabetes is consuming the world's population. Through The Fraternal Order of Eagles Diabetes Research Center at the University of Iowa, it is our goal to help bring an end to the suffering and find a cure.

thank you

We appreciate your support! For more than a century, The Fraternal Order of Eagles has been an international organization bound together by a single theme: People Helping People. Our unified fight against the ravages of diabetes follows many other ongoing efforts.

We raise millions of dollars every year to combat heart disease and cancer, help handicapped kids, uplift the aged and make life a little brighter for everyone. And, we uphold and nourish the values of home, family and community in all we do. Please join us!

Amanda's story

making history

In the summer of 2008, more than 700 Fraternal Order of Eagles delegates unanimously voted to pledge $25 million over five years to the University of Iowa to fund The Fraternal Order of Eagles Diabetes Research Center. Since that day, the organization has been heavily committed to helping in the quest to cure diabetes.

All funds donated by the Eagles will be put directly toward research within the facility. $15 million will be placed in endowments used to fund researchers and research programs in the facility while $10 million in non-endowed funds will be used to help recruit leaders in the field of diabetes science and translational medicine.

“Together, we will find a way.”

- Sally Mason, President,
The University of Iowa

Doctors at the university are currently exploring alternatives to typical insulin injections and pancreas transplants to help combat diabetes. With the boundaries of medicine growing exponentially, medical solutions such as stem cell transplants increase in potential. With the help of your donation, The University of Iowa can continue to push the boundaries of medicine and end the effect diabetes has on millions of lives each day.

The greatest discoveries are born of an extreme commitment to fulfilling a dream. Our dream is to cure diabetes. Help us make history.

“I want to get the cure. I wouldn't want to just live with this for the rest of my life.”

- Amanda Christ

Call it a mother's instinct. From the moment Kathy Christ arrived to pick up her nine-year-old daughter Amanda after a two-week stay with her father, she knew something was wrong. She was thinner, with her hips, ribs and shoulder blades protruding out of a frame that once appeared perfectly healthy.

“I was shocked,” Christ said. “Once we returned home, I made an appointment with the family doctor. A couple days later, I received a telephone call at work. It was the doctor and he wanted me to bring Amanda into the office immediately. They did a urinalysis at the office and the doctor came back into the room with the terrible news that Amanda was in ketoacidosis.”

Amanda had Type-I diabetes. She began on four shots of insulin per day and had to test her blood sugar 6-8 times per day. It wasn't a normal life - but it never would be living with diabetes.

The people around Amanda suddenly changed – frightened by the thought of what could happen in her presence. “Amanda's babysitter didn't want to take care of her anymore after she was diagnosed,” Christ said. “Some of her friends at school no longer wanted to play with her or invite her to birthday parties.”
